

ALL IN

Concept art and design

HackRice 16 · Rust + Bevy · every asset drawn procedurally

The system

felt #10392C

felt-deep #0A211A

noir
#09090C

gold
#C9A227

gold-lit
#F2DC8B

bone
#EDE4D0

blood
#8E1B23

Limelight — display

ALL IN • THE PIT

Barlow Condensed — body, and the game's default face

The lobby smells like carpet shampoo and old cigarettes.

Seven colours and two faces. Everything else follows from them.

The card face

240 x 340 authored

as the game draws them — 120 x 170

A guilloche rosette inside a three-part bezel — authored at 2x, drawn at 120x170.

The card face: three tries

320 x 448 — wrong ratio

double rule — reads flat

engine-turned — shipped

The first was off-ratio; the second notched its own corners against a square border.

The Tells

Streak

at 28px

All In

at 28px

All In was a stack of chips first. The gaps between them vanished at 28px, so it became a card with a line through it — which is what the Tell does anyway: it burns one.

They render at 28 pixels, so the silhouette is the entire design.

The backdrops

combat — text sits in the outer bands lobby — prose sits in the middle

The lobby first measured 2.33:1 against its own text because it had been tuned for the combat layout. Same art, different screen, wrong place kept dark.

Colour at the edges, dark where the text lands — each graded for its own screen.

The House and its floor bosses

SLOTZ

THE PIT BOSS

THE HOUSE

Nobody has a face. The House is a pair of hands that never move.

The Opening: one table, three moments everything he owned

the boy beside the chair

the chair empty

Same lamp, same hands. Only the felt changes — that is the whole story.

The Opening: the walk back across the street, under the sign inside, doors swinging shut

Twenty-five years later, and the doors closing behind him.

The Opening: what it replaced first pass: chips leaving first pass: a photograph shipped: chips stacked high shipped: a boy beside the chair

Drawn to the wrong beats before the narrative split landed, then redrawn to the script.